“PRESIDENT LINCOLN’S LITTLE KINDNESS”

(article published in The Beacon, January 1, 2016 page 15)

“At the start of the Civil War, many Wisconsin residents criticized Abraham Lincoln for exceeding the constitutional authority of the President. Many even sympathized openly with the South. Loyal Republicans chose Professor Damon Kilgore, head of the Evansville Seminary, to travel to Washington and warn Lincoln about the presence of traitors in the North.

“Professor Kilgore may have been among frontier Wisconsin’s elite, but he was not well-acquainted with the manners of polite society back east. Invited to lunch at the White House, he found himself seated right beside President Lincoln. Feeling painfully nervous, Kilgore nevertheless made it through most of the meal without embarrassing himself.

“But when the luncheon was nearly finished, a small bowl filled with water and a slice of lemon was placed before him. Finger bowls, used for dipping and cleaning the hands after a meal, had just come into vogue in America and Kilgore had never seen one. He assumed it was lemonade.

“Before the professor could commit the faux pas of drinking it, Lincoln leaned over and whispered discreetly, ‘Don’t sip out of that bowl. Watch me.’ The President then casually demonstrated its proper use and Kilgore was spared public humiliation. Later, when they were meeting alone, Lincoln confessed that he himself ‘needed a servant to keep him informed about those little things.’

“The editor who printed that recollection nearly 60 years later admitted that, ‘we cannot vouch for the truth of the story.’ But as the old saying goes, if it’s not true, it ought to be.

“This and many other fascinating stories about history in Wisconsin are available on the website of the Wisconsin Historical Society, www.wisconsinhistory.org.”
